Travel Blog #4

Today I visited the Gateway Science Museum with my group. We arrived at the museum at 4 pm, and because of this late time most of the staff was preparing to close the exhibits, but we were able to explore all of the exhibits. One exhibit that we all enjoyed was this touch screen that showed a lot of different things for the local area, such as groundwater, land use, and geology. Another interesting exhibit showed an example of how some special microscopes can zoom into a nanometer on a mosquito's wing. We didn't interview anyone there today because we wanted to get a feel for the place first, and see what spots appear to be popular amongst patrons, we'll need to go again at a better time to determine which exhibit seems popular and interview some patrons and workers. Overall, we were able to explore most of the exhibits and get familiarized with the environment.
